<sup>1</sup> I would like to thank Simon Mongey for excellent research assistance, as well as Mei-Hsu Chen and Grace Gao for helpful comments.

The PhD Conference in Economics and Business is an annual event that brings together students and academics from most Australian universities, as well as some overseas institutions. The basic objective of the conference is to help with the training of promising doctoral students by giving them the opportunity to gain feedback on and exposure for their research. It also enables PhD students to meet with their peers and to make contact with senior academics and researchers with similar interests. Furthermore, it acts as an informal job market in which the students can demonstrate their abilities and attract attention to their prospects. The conference series is a joint venture between the Business School of the University of Western Australia and the Centre for Economic Policy Research at the Australian National University, as well as Queensland Institute of Technology in some recent years. The location of the conference alternates between Canberra (in even years) and Perth (odd).

The conference is a response to the feeling that PhD students would benefit from being exposed to a broader group of scholars. The students present papers on their research and receive comments on their work from prominent scholars in the area. The tone of the conference is highly professional but constructive and supportive, with the students the focus of attention. One feature of the conference is the outstanding quality of the discussants' comments. The student papers are circulated beforehand and discussants (usually senior scholars with extensive experience in supervision) prepare written comments. The conference thus provides a unique opportunity for students to discuss their research, meet leading scholars and employers, and become part of an important professional network of active researchers. In addition to supporting the students' work directly, the conference has also led to solutions to research problems, identification of examiners for theses, initiation of joint research and jobs for students.<sup>2</sup>

The conference is well known throughout Australia and has been readily embraced by Australian universities, which send students and staff. Indeed, each year there are more students nominated than we can accommodate. Over the past 21 years, the conference has attracted more than 550 students, many established scholars in economics and finance and a number of major employer groups as sponsors. Selection panels for appointments in economics and finance regularly see curriculum vitae that list the presentation of a paper at one of the conferences, indicating the value students place on this activity. Another measure of the conference's influence is that the model has been emulated by other groups.

This paper marks the occasion of 21 conferences by recording much of the proceedings of the past conferences.<sup>3</sup> The tables and figures that follow give details of the conferences, the students, the discussants and the sponsors. Several features should be mentioned. First, Figure 1 reveals that ANU is by far the leading supplier of both students and discussants. Second, from Figure 2, we see that Geoff Kingston (of Macquarie University) has acted as a discussant of papers no less than 17 times; then comes Bob Gregory (ANU), who has discussed 11 papers. Third, a number of institutions are long-standing sponsors of the conference; from Figure 3, these include the Reserve Bank of Australia, the Australian Bureau of Statistics, the Productivity Commission and the Economic Society of Australia. Finally, Table A1 shows that among the 500+ students involved, only two have the distinction of presenting two papers: Jacqueline Dwyer, now of the RBA, and David Gruen, now at Commonwealth Treasury.

The 22nd conference will be held at UWA from 4-6 November 2009. The conference is being convened by Ken Clements and Izan, and is coordinated by Sandra Pollock.
